

Published based on Did They Sense A 'top' In The Marketplace For Personal Equity?

Did They Sense A 'top' In The Marketplace For Personal Equity?

Folk frequently compare it to venture capital but this one only provides funds to new or lately opened firms. Investing funds is typically directed to non-public equity, meaning societies that aren't listed in the open markets. Capital speculators get their non-public equity from the stock of existing stockholders. They can also buy new shares from the company that are issued for those purposes. Why would they do that? That's inconsistent and hypocritical with their full philosophy of how much better it is to run firms secretly. Did they sense a 'top' in the marketplace for non-public equity? I believe so. The industry insider 'smart money' was selling, so why should we be purchasing? Blackstone (BX) is among the largest players in the non-public equity business. More usually they have expertise in a selected industry.

You can frequently gain understanding of a VC's investment preferences by reviewing its web site. Being in the same general location as a portfolio company permits the VC to better help with business operations like selling, staff, and financing. As well as industry preferences, VCs also sometimes have a geographic preference. Remember that venture capital isn't a choice for all new firms.